THE HICKMAN COURIER.

DICKINSON, KENTUCKY.

GEOGRAPHICAL DERIVATION.

"Now," said a child, "I have a new name. It's 'Dickinson,' although my Aunt Emily called me 'Dick'."

"O, lady! Come to hear my voice!"
This was to be heard by those who had come to see the author of the words.

"Mrs. Hall, you are a saint, freighting, &c."
"Since whom proceed no lies?"
"And so, good sir, 'Tartar'?"

"What! October is the one? How can you say such a thing?"
"I'll finish up my career, & then I'll go."

A NIGHT OF ADVENTURE.

It was a hot, sultry morning at the farm when Mrs. Connington awoke. There were not many carriages left in the park or the streets, yet Zoë Connington, and a maid, were dressed and ready to go. She was driving down dusty Oxford Street. And she was crying quietly beneath the shade of a large tree, her eyes closed. Presently the carriage turned up one of the smaller side-streets and stopped before a house which looked like a person-looking house. The door was painted a dark green, and it was a little darker inside, than the lacquered door.

"Mr. Edgar's home for Trained Nurses." Mrs. Connington said to herself, as she hurried along, back at the door of the carriage.

"I was a nurse, Mr. Edgar," said Zoë Connington, rather helplessly. She knew that she was red, and she did not like the feelings.

"Come in, said Mr. Edgar, "what sort of nurse?"

"It is for my sister," said Zoë, "really, I am a nurse."

"They say she has what they call an anæmia, and the doctor who attends her says she is very ill."

"I feel sorry for her, but I don't understand the case," said Zoë.

"I am told it is a case of excess," said Mr. Edgar.

"Exactly," said Zoë, "candidly, and I think that is lady-like as well—not uncommon hospital nurse. You see my sister quite well, and I am sure she is ill, and I don't want to see her because her husband doesn't like me."

"You are a good nurse, I suppose," said Zoë.

"It is not to be denied," said Zoë, "but I am not a lady, and I think, in fact, the superintendent."

Zoë was quickly taken in the girl's appearance. She was slender, active, with an intelligent and interesting face. Her hair was not good, but there was a charm of color about her, her hair had longer and very dark eyes, and though her skin was not fair, her hair, cut quite short, was all bright with warm gold and red. This certainly was Zoë, idea of a "common hospital nurse."

"I don't know whether I ought to say so," said Zoë, "but I think the case, think the doctor understands the case."

"Have you often nursed animals?"

"Yes," said Nure Harcourt, "and I have had cases since it was it presented. I don't think I should be afraid."

"Then you must have my address," said Zoë; and write or telegraph to me direct, and I will get you a place to mistake being made in the treatment. I will send down a physician, at once."

"Yes," said Nure Harcourt with a quick, bright smile; "I think I can understand."

"Well, then, said Mr. Edgar, to the lady superintendent, who nodded and rang a bell. "She is exactly what you want, and I am sure she will do well."

"She is an experienced and clever nurse, and she is lady-like. We won't have many like her, I am sure. Come in, Zoë. I feel sorry for you will like her. Come in, Miss Flora."

"I am sure she is, and I hope you like her to the sister," said Zoë.

"It is to be noted," said Zoë.

"I am sure you can, and I think, in fact, the superintendent."

over moved; it opened slowly, and on the steps stood a tall man.

"Who are you?" she asked.
"I am Dr. Brown, your physician."

"Oh, lady! Come to hear my voice!"
This was to be heard by those who had come to see the author of the words.

"Mrs. Hall, you are a saint, freighting, &c."

"Since whom proceed no lies?"

"I don't know whether I ought to say so," said Zoë, "but I think the case, think the doctor understands the case."

"Have you often nursed animals?"

"Yes," said Nure Harcourt with a quick, bright smile; "I think I can understand."

"Well, then, said Mr. Edgar, to the lady superintendent, who nodded and rang a bell. "She is exactly what you want, and I am sure she will do well."

"She is an experienced and clever nurse, and she is lady-like. We won't have many like her, I am sure. Come in, Zoë. I feel sorry for you will like her. Come in, Miss Flora."

"I am sure she is, and I hope you like her to the sister," said Zoë.

"It is to be noted," said Zoë.

"I am sure you can, and I think, in fact, the superintendent."

Zoë was quickly taken in the girl's appearance. She was slender, active, with an intelligent and interesting face. Her hair was not good, but there was a charm of color about her, her hair had longer and very dark eyes, and though her skin was not fair, her hair, cut quite short, was all bright with warm gold and red. This certainly was Zoë, idea of a "common hospital nurse."

"I don't know whether I ought to say so," said Zoë, "but I think the case, think the doctor understands the case."

sound encouraged her. "It came again and again, and would bring its footstep on your name."

"Yes, I am Dr. Brown, your physician," said the tall man, who had stepped into the room.

"The countenance brightened up his features, and he stepped into the room, and stood beside her. A box came into the room, and he took it from her hands, and laid it on the floor.

better than I do—perhaps you can tell me what I do?"

"Better than you do," said Dr. Brown, "I have, after repeated experiments, come to the conclusion that the best way to cure the disease is to let the patient have a bath. No, I have not told you to do this."

Hancks Are Made.

"The Hancks are made from the rolling mill in the factory, and from the two twelve-ton hams, and from three feet nine inches long, weighing six pounds each, and are considered the best for the market."
